TERMINAL TERRORISTS DEFACE SHRINE OF THE HERO

Hyrule Town guard investigating how a 3 Gerudo and a Deku Scrub managed to get past them and mutilate a statue of The Hero of Time.

HYRULE TOWN

Members of a known Terminal Terror group have already claimed responsibility for re-sculpting a statue of Link, Hylian Hero of Time in order to bring public attention to the needs of Terminal creatures living in Hyrule. The statue, which stands in the center of the shrine in Hyrule Town, was defaced by making Him look like a Deku Scrub instead of a Hylian. The Hylian military is active investigating, and even though it was their own lack of preparedness that allowed the attack to happen in the first place, they are working to insure that something like this will NEVER happen again. Any information leading to the capture and execution of these Terrorists will be greatly rewarded by the King.

GORON SABOTEURS EXECUTED

HYRULE TOWN

After being caught red-handed replacing the wheels of the King's war chariots with unusable rocks and boulders, a group of Terrorist Gorons were executed by the King himself this afternoon. Claiming it was "a great sadness, personally" for him, the King reminded the audience how the Gorons and Hylians used to be friends, even invoking the Darunian Brother Bond all Hylians share with The Hero, but then condemning their actions, rightly linking them to a rising antihylian hate rising across the land. The executed Gorons were to be laid to rest at one of the peaks of Death Mountain in a private ceremony with their families, but the bodies have yet to be released by the Hylian military for "security concerns", and could remain there indefinitely.

DECEPTION FROM CHILDREN: THE INSIDIOUS EFFECT OF BRAINWASHING

They say truth comes from the mouths of babes. But when those babes are taught and fed on poisonous lies and a steady diet of hate and intolerance for Hylians, what comes out those babes' mouths tends to be more of the same: lies and more lies. But it's easy to talk in the abstract like this, let's put a face to it:

Meet Ook. He's a child Deku Scrub. He recently got Hyrule-wide attention for a drawing he made that's now been appearing all over several prominent Hylian towns. In this drawing, he showed a Hylian army going up against an army of Deku Scrubs, Zora, Gerudo, and Gorons. When the two armies meet, an explosion of Triforce shards and Giant masks rain down on both armies, changing both sides until the other side looks more Hylian and the Hylians start to look like the other monsters. It ends with both armies hugging and laying down their swords.

The people who defend this "artwork" claim it's a beautiful innocent expression of the desire for peace that the children of both sides share for ending this conflict. However, if you look closely, you'll find a calculated and deliberate attempt to undermine Hylian values, mock everything that we hold dear, and even destroy our very culture at the root, obliterating us until we are just another race of Terminal Animals.

The Goddesses themselves chose the Hylians to reside and rule over the rest of Their creation, and any position that denies us the absolute right, authority, even duty, to rule this land is an affront to us, everything our future stands for, and even to the Goddesses themselves. By illustrating Hylians as Just Another Animal Race, they diminish our very identity, that which makes us Hylian.

And to those who say I'm being paranoid, this is exactly the kind of brainwashing and systematic propaganda machine these animals have instilled, brainwashing even their youngest and most innocent into believing that true peace can only come with the complete destruction of Hyrule and its people, The Hylians. The proof is in the pudding, you can hide the hate and hypocrisy in your own words, but in the mouths of babes, perhaps even when it's filled with lies to begin with, the truth does eventually come out. If only you know exactly how to look at it, like we do.

CRIME UP IN NON-HYLIAN HYRULE, PEOPLE DEMAND ACTION OUTWORLD

A recent spike in violent crime in unsettled portions of Hyrule has Hylian soldiers up in arms and demanding greater military presence throughout the kingdom. Last week a Hylian settler and his family were murdered and robbed, a gang of Zora were shortly thereafter apprehended and found guilty and executed in a "Trial of the People". Last month, a young Goron was taken out after he started throwing homemade bombs from the top of Clock Town's clock tower, killing 7 and injuring another 18. Just last night, a wave of Gerudo vandalism saw dozens of settlers' farm equipment broken, defaced, or stolen.

The King's Council on Order Among the Unsettled Lands has convened in Hyrule Town to discuss their options. A popular one among the people seems to be the simplest: more soldiers in more places.

"We've been too gentle with these monsters, we need to show them who's in charge around here," one settler said to us in response to this recent wave of trouble. "If we just do what we always should have done and settle it all we'd all be better off. Even the monsters."

Another popular idea is a tiered system of justice.

"I think there should be different punishments for Hylians and Terminals. I just don't think that most Hylians are out to destroy anyone. We just want to make the world a better place. But everything that the Terminals do seems to be more violent, so we need to think about that when they are punished."

But whatever is done, one thing is certain, non-Hylian crime is up and we must do anything and everything we can to protect our people from the violent tendencies of these creatures.

ENOUGH WITH THE HALF-MEASURES! YOU KNOW WHAT WE REALLY NEED...

Sanctions never work, it's time for boots on the ground in all of the sectors where the animal races of Hyrule live to figure out exactly where these antihylian terrorists are coming from.

People don't want to hear it said this way, but it doesn't make it any less true: These creatures don't know how good they have it and they're willing to destroy everything just to prove it. Before The Great Return, life in what would soon be Hyrule was scrabbling, hard, and full of tough choices, petty tribal squabbles, and ruthless bands of warriors terrorizing anyone not strong enough to stand up to them. The Hylians brought order, power, and wisdom, if only the people who lived here had the courage to face it like that and benefit from our gifts to them. But for the most part, they've slapped our hand at every turn, outstretched as it has been with the gifts of civilization. Now there are always good ones in any group, I play Hookshot Dodgeball with a wonderful Goron, and my barber is a Gerudo, but mostly these Terminal animals are brutal, primitive, thankless and angry, resentful at the very people who brought them the greatest years of peace and plenty these lands have ever seen, thank the Goddesses.

And now a good number of them (in fact no one REALLY knows how rampant this radicalism has actually spread among those types) are picking up arms, acting, trying to bring about the destruction of the Hylian Kingdom, in some misguided attempt to "take back" something they never really had to begin with... control of this land. These terminal animals that whine and cry about how the Hylians took their country, let me ask you something? Which race was it you're from again? And how many centuries exactly did your people rule over everyone? Unless they're a Gerudo, that answer will always be "zero". No race of people has ever successfully ruled this land like the Hylians, and no one but the Gerudo have ever controlled it for any length of time. So what is it exactly we were supposed to have "taken"? A land, ruled by no one, possessing nothing, full of creatures who couldn't care less about government, order, and social governance.

Up until now, our King has chosen, in his Infinite wisdom, to only pursue economic sanctions against groups from parts of Hyrule where some Terminal tribes still actively support rebellion and refuse to acknowledge the existence of Hyrule. No trade, no rupees, no help or support from military or King's Council. Nearly all of these tribes fell back to medieval levels rather quickly, and we saw a little motion from people wanting out and were willing to do the right thing in order for a better life in the Town. But now, it's not doing a thing to help us root out these radicals where they live.

I understand the King has to think of everyone and everything, so I'm sure he has his reasons for waiting this long, but in my humble opinion, economic sanctions are over as an effective strategy against these animals. You know what we need... soldiers, and a lot of them. Sending the Hylian army into ANY suspected sympathizer group would let everyone in Hyrule know, you follow the King or pay the Hylian price.

SWIMMING WITH THE ZORAS

"They just don't get it, I really don't like the water, but they kept pushing me in there."

ZORA'S DOMAIN

A Hylian soldier stationed in Zora's domain for a few seasons is opening up about his time among the "Fish People". Dupo Miller is 23 years old, which means he has been a soldier for over 10 years and has a spotless service record, working with Gorons, Deku Scrubs and Gerudo successfully for years with no problems. But that was before he met the Zoras.

The Zoras were once a dominant force in Hyrule before The Great Return. But superior Hylian warfare and technology, as well as the power derived from our divine right from the Goddesses saw the Zoras crumble before Hylian power centuries ago. Now, the Zoras are a minor player in our world, mostly keeping to their Domain, a few coming back to spend short stretches at breathtaking Lake Hylia.

But recent terrorist activity show that many of these groups have had an alarmingly large proportion of Zora members. It's that trend that led the King to order a new permanent Hylian presence in Zora's Domain. Dupo was one of those deployed to the Domain, and had been doing his job as the King commanded, keeping watch over one of the entrances to the Zora King's chambers, when he was repeatedly harassed by one loudmouth Zora, clearly indoctrinated in antihylian hate speech, and usually accompanied by a group of Zora thugs to further try and intimidate this brave soldier.

"This guy, man he was always all up in my face. And you might not know this, but when you first come into a place like this, you have to just take it, i mean just a little bit, you know? These creatures are wound up tight having us all up in them and they're not used to be told what to do and shit. Even just the kids, they're curious to see what a real person looks like up close and everything, so you just kind of let them push you a little more than you eventually end up letting them. But this guy was over the line. Poking me in the chest screaming at the top of his lungs right in my face. I let him poke me a couple times but when he got too close, I knocked him to the floor and put my spear to his throat. I told him that if he ever did it again I wouldn't stop until he was PERMANENTLY quiet, you know what I mean. Haha, he turned white as a sheet. Even for a fish thingy."

But the altercations didn't end there.

"Him and his buddies, they knew I didn't like the water, I wear so much armor when I'm on duty, it's dangerous, you know? But they just kept pushing me in there, pretending we were playing a "Zora game" to make up. No matter how many times I climbed out, they kept pushing me in. I thought for sure I was going to drown."

It's a miracle Dupo was able to escape with his life at all, only by using a secret tunnel that put him out in Lake Hylia was he able to get to land and regroup.

"Of course, I went right back there, and brought some of MY friends this time haha. It took the Zora cleaning fish days to clean the fish guts off the cave walls after we got through with him and his little gang of terrorists. And good riddance too. But I'm done working with those things, even if I wanted to they won't have me now haha. But whatever, just a bunch of fish monsters if you ask me."

After the incident, Dupo was moved to another village, and quietly given a condemnation and a medal for his bravery and to appease the growing disquiet in the Zora community.

"It just goes to show, what these things understand is force. Once I showed them that I was just as willing to kill them, and a lot better at it, they stopped doing the terrorist crap they were doing. Hylians owe it to the world to use our force to bring everyone else to their knees so that the overworld will truly become a better place."
